Opioid antagonists, such as naloxone, are potentially life-saving prescription medications used to reverse overdoses caused by heroin and opioids. New York State has made progress expanding access to naloxone and similar drugs. In 2006, New York State passed a law authorizing non-medical personnel to administer naloxone to individuals who seek it. A 2014 law expanded this to allow the prescribing, dispensing, and distribution of opioid antagonists by a non-patient specific order. In addition, many first responders now receive training to administer naloxone.

While the State has expanded the number of laypeople and professionals that are trained to administer naloxone, potential gaps in access may still remain. Not all first responders receive training, and many do not have access to naloxone. Statewide, colleges, universities, homeless shelters, and other locations do not have universal access to naloxone.

In addition, availability for consumers continues to be limited. While pharmacies are able to dispense naloxone to consumers without a prescription, according to a recent New York Times article, actual availability varies. With over 1.9 million New Yorkers suffering from substance use disorders in the past year according to the Department of Health, access to a potentially life-saving medication is a crucial step towards combatting this epidemic.

This hearing is intended to examine availability of and barriers to life-saving overdose medications such as naloxone, and the steps the State can take to get these medications into the hands of more individuals.
